Viennese coffee house

„Central is not a coffeehouse like any other
– it’s a philosophy.“

Alfred Polgar

07 Traditional Viennese coffee house

1856-60

The young architect Heinrich von Ferstel builds the opulent Palais with its fantastic Venetian-cum-Florentine-cum-Trecento architecture, inspired from his long journey through Italy. "The Ferstel" was the most fashionable building in Vienna.

1876

For the first time Gustav & Hermann Pach open the former "Börsecafé" in the stock exchange at the Café Central in the Palais Ferstel – at the time the most modern building in Vienna, formerly used as a bank and stock exchange building

1860

The Vienna Stock Exchange rents the ground floor, today's Café Central. And the Austrian-Hungarian national Bank is based at Palais Ferstel.

From 1900

the café has cult status. The regular guests – among them grand literary figures, poets and thinkers – call themselves "Centralists", after the café. Because if they had not just been with us, then they were on their way. The meeting place for intellectual Vienna.

1925

One year before the newly redecorated Café Central celebrates its 50th anniversary the café becomes a café-restaurant. It now has an arcaded courtyard, a columned hall, a ladies' salon and a games room.

1943

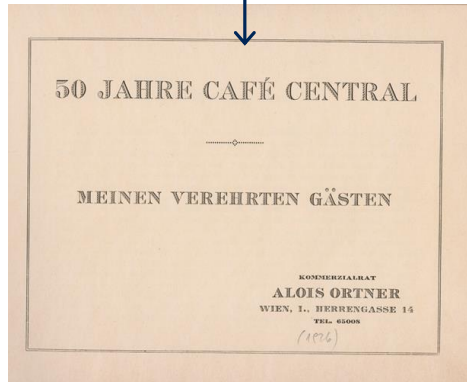

The curtain falls: the Central has to close for four decades. It becomes an archive and storage area in the heavily damaged Palais Ferstel.

1970-80

The decade of the new beginning: the greatly faded splendour of the Palais Ferstel is restored by a careful revitalization by the Austrian Real Estate AG.

1938

The dark days cast their shadows on the Central. And many of the regular guests lose their second home or even their lives during the Second World War.

1981-83

The arcade courtyard is also revitalized and in the meantime the Café Central opens its doors. The ORF's (Austrian Broadcasting Company's) well-known cultural and discussion programme "Café Central" is then broadcast from here.

1986

Together with the large Ferstel Hall above, the Café is refurbished in the final stages of the renovation. In 1986 the Central re-opens in the magnificent columned hall.

2001

The Karl Wlaschek Private Foundation takes over the Palais Ferstel with the Café Central and establishes the Palais Events Veranstaltungen limited company to run the properties. Later the company also manages the Wiener Börsensäle (Vienna Stock Exchange Halls) and the Palais Daun-Kinsky.

2006

The arcade courtyard reopens for coffeehouse guests and groups.
